I'd

like to know the following: Why does C++ generate a DLL instead of a static library? What is the difference between a static library and a DLL? Why would I want to use either, and what is the main scenario for each? A: A DLL is a standard way to share code across multiple compilation units. A static library is sort of similar, but doesn't allow for code to be statically included as a part of an executable, which is arguably a good thing. The typical scenario for both of them is when you need to dynamically load the code you're using; for example when you're using third-party libraries for which there are versions built for Windows, Linux and OS X, and your application is built for Windows. A DLL allows you to use the same code across all those platforms (and variants thereof), without needing to copy and maintain different versions of the library code. A: An easy way to think of the difference between static and DLL is to imagine each as an infinite box. A static library is like having an infinite box from which you can only take things out, but never put anything in. You can make calls out, for example, but not put anything in. A DLL is like having an infinite box with a door. This box can be put inside any other box you want; the door is there for you to open in the future if you want to. But you can also make calls out and receive responses, without ever putting anything inside. The static library version is like having a big refrigerator inside your house. You just leave it alone and it keeps the things you put in it. The DLL version is like having a freezer inside your house. You walk over to it and open the door, and it keeps the things you put in 04aeff104c
