Adobe is intensively testing the features. "We're committed to getting Photoshop to be the best photo editing, design and collaboration app for macOS. We need user feedback so we can iron out any kinks and make it accessible to as many people as possible. Share for Review allows Photoshop to share files seamlessly across desktops much like Windows 10's Share for Windows. This allows users to collaborate and publish different versions and states of an art project, and it allows them to work on their own many art projects without installing any software." Adobe ultimately intends to have all of its desktop apps support AI-based editing, for example. What's more, the company's existing desktop tools, such as the Adobe XD app, can automatically import Photoshop files, which helps speed users' entry into Photoshop. And as AI-based solutions become more refined and versatile, they could enable professionals to create, edit and collaborate on even more work in Photoshop. Adobe Photoshop for iOS and macOS also offers predictive functionality to speed up the workflow while users are creating an image. Often, Photoshop users create images and go back to change something later. That process could become much faster and easier if the app could present a preview of the edited image, even on iPhone (iOS 13 and later). Photo editing apps may not need a lot of AI because of the amount of human input required. AI's true benefits are when it can change an image autonomously. Elsewhere in enterprise, AI solutions can help companies predict the needs of customers, such as recommendations for products or services.
