How do the iPad app and the Mac version of Photoshop in Lightroom for Mac compare? For the most part they are the same, with a few small differences, such as the optional Smart Preview. The iPad version of Lightroom is fairly bare-bones, feeling more like an illustration app than a standard photo editing program. However, some of the features that the iPad app offers are really unexpected: For example, you can now apply the same image adjustment to multiple photos at the same time with the new Smart Preview tool. I've already used this feature to apply adjustments to multiple photos in a group without having to export them to my computer first - a nice time-saver. Supporting RAW files is also an added bonus, which for me is a huge improvement since Lightroom only supports JPEG files for importing and exporting. For people who have used the photography apps for the iPhone, the iPad version of Lightroom still holds up well and we appreciate the extra native features. There's not much in the way of color matching and it doesn't quite have all of the same editing tools as Photoshop, but for the basics it does the job well. What I really like about the new Lightroom version is the most recent updates. Some of the changes, such as the addition of the Vintype rendering engine, are less ground-shaking than others, such as the minor artboards redesign. Lightroom's collection of video tools now includes support for on-screen editing functions.
