I feel Lightroom has gained complexity that outweighs the benefits. I should admit, I hadn't had much experience with the development side of Adobe's software, having instead focused on the general image editing side. As such, its feature-set was of little relevance to me. However, Lightroom 5 has included a raft of new features, and the more I use it, the more I see the benefits of its development. With that said, its feature list has more to do with its plugin character than Photoshop. There are some compelling features here, but I can't help but wonder if they are being used in the best way. Cross-platform editing differences are the biggest of the lot. Lightroom 5 has a whole raft of new features which are so useful that the company has added them as plugins. These are called Develop Open up, Print Open up, Merge Open up, and Create Open up. Notifications can now be accompanied by a drag-and-drop menu hierarchy. If you are using the DNG workflow, you can now sort by metadata. A Facial Recognition feature is also usable in Lightroom for the first time. This is good for automatically searching for faces that are both in Photos and in the Adobe catalogue. The Import module is new and has a variety of uses, and the updated Quick Develop module can now be used directly in your catalogues. The Free Transform tool has been moved to the Analyze tab, and the original rotate tool has a new functionality to crop images by exact percentages. One of my reasons for going back to Lightroom is to gain a bit more control over files I import, especially for large ones. I wanted to know how much time I need to spend to get good results. As I mentioned elsewhere, Lightroom is very powerful for smaller files, such as single images or single groups. For large files, however, the performance is not very impressive and, more importantly, some operations are just impossible.
