In addition to a wide range of new features for the Photoshop desktop app, Adobe is also integrating new AI functionality to Photoshop CC. With the launch of Photoshop CC, AI-powered features including the Darkroom, Adjustment Panel and Actions Panel can now be found in the features of Photoshop CC. The company also demoed ExpressiveImages, a new feature to automatically make adjustments to the images in an image stack, including white, black and grey balance. To understand these new innovations, attendees could visit a live panel session. Ryan Lennon, senior product manager at Adobe, started the conversation on Aug. 3 in LA with a presentation about PBS Edu. "We've been working with PBS as a part of this for a long time," Lennon said. That includes providing a mobile app for PBS Education and PBS Kids apps such as the Fine Arts supplement. Lennon explained that Adobe has recently made its AI capabilities available to educators so they can make better judgment decisions about what's best for their students. That includes adjusting images, including white, black and grey balance. "We're ultimately about helping people to explore, manipulate and create," Lennon said. For the Facebook community, another plus is that you can use Facebook directly from within the application. "We can help them quickly," Lennon said. "That means less clicks and less time." In a chat with VSCO President and Creative Director Devin Le, Lenon introduced the VSCO camera for video. An app for landscape or portrait, it's optimized for HD, but also works with regular, S-Log (250/512), S-Log2 (500/1024) or S-Log3 (1250/2048) cameras. "It's a great capture tool for photographers," Lennon said. Today, they will ship the film emulsion, in the camera and in the application. It later goes to the lab.
