If you use Photoshop while on the road or working with a laptop, or if your only shooting equipment is a Canon Rebel T5i, I'm afraid you're out of luck. Yep — Photoshop is just not meant to target all but the highest-end models of camera. There is no way to resize images in Commotion, so you're stuck with the same proportions as when you shot them. The number of preset guides (perfect for beginners and photographers with no real artistic credentials) is too low, and the least-savvy artists will want to start from scratch every time they want to create a specific, artistic pattern. (That's the gloomy situation with any camera that lacks RAW capability. Bondi is among several different facial features the software can detect in your photos. Adobe Camera Raw (ACR) 8.2, released late in March, adds the "Corrective" feature in the "Detail" panel. You can remove unwanted flash as well as other atmospheric effects. The feature is invisible to the naked eye but produces fluid results. You can also remove elements detected via the Automatic Portrait Detect feature, remove the zoom effect from older images, and correct the color tint for skin areas that were inaccurately enhanced. ACR has seen changes with the release of Photokit 8.2 as well. You can create a unique look, and be able to apply that to all of your images when saving into the Photo Stream feature. Another change is that the "Photostitch" editor, the feature that removes digital noise from a series of photos, can now work with images that are taken into and out of ACR. There are also individual updates to individual panels, such as the Camera RAW Editor. I'll cover that in the next section.
