Back in the day, resolution was a critical aspect of monitors and how manufacturers touted the capabilities of their TVs. Now you can simply buy the highest resolution display you can afford. For that matter, it no longer really matters. However, when it comes to image editing, it is only the number of pixels that is important, not whether that number is 1440 x 900 or 2560 x 1440, or even 3600 x 2400. The latter is simply too big to fit into a 5:3 screen. In other words, it's just a non-starter. For all of those reasons, I ordered a 27-inch 1440p desktop which works well with Photoshop CC. It has excellent display quality, and has proved to be a bit of a nightmare. As you may know, I am just getting into Photoshop and trying to learn everything about it. Since yesterday, I have been using the new subscription model, which might just be the best option for certain people. Besides, is not as if you are leasing anything and you can simply delete it if you do not like it. I get questions about if I like the fact that everything in Photoshop is tied to the cloud. I admit, I am not a big fan of this aspect, but it is how things are. I don't mind using a web interface if it is so convenient, and if you work with large databases such as Lightroom, the entire workflow has become more streamlined, which is a good thing. At this point, I can say that I enjoy the interface and what Adobe has done in the desktop version. Photoshop also seems to be a bit better with Silverlight and Windows 8 than previous versions. I experienced no crashing, but I did not slam my computer, either. Lightroom, though, made a good impression. In many ways, I find it a bit easier to work with compared with Photoshop. After all, most users do not need to display images on a full-size grid, and only a fraction of them even need filters. Besides, Lightroom does not have a crazy amount of complex adjustments and tools. Of course, there's a workflow to learn: import, process, edit, organize, then collect data and attach to a project. Transferring data to another system is also an excellent alternative. For example, once I finished a batch of images in Photoshop, I simply set the image files to open in Lightroom. The other way around is also great as an order in which to sort your projects hierarchically and to work on HDTV displays at the same time. In other words, you can do everything from the couch.

Sure. So, first and foremost, being the first non-engineer writer at Ken, I will instead give a pitch between myself and the engineers. I'm actually writing this from the perspective of somebody who's often trying to convert them. And saying "Hey, I understand that you're really more engineer than I am." And I said, "You know what? This person hates marketing and they don't know anything about the engineering decisions that they're making. And so that's actually a great place to be." I think I'm a really good person to write off-grid because I'm a pacifist. I don't get along with people.
